FREE SAMPLE · CHAPTER 1

Are You Ready?

You've probably pictured it already. The plane lands, you've got a jersey with your name on the back, there's a small gym full of fans who know who you are, and you get a paycheck for hooping.

That picture is real. Thousands of Americans live some version of it every season, in leagues from Spain to the Philippines to Uruguay to Luxembourg.

But here's the part nobody posts about: most players who want that life never get a first contract. That's rarely because they can't play. Usually they don't understand how the people doing the signing think.

This chapter is the honest version. It covers how the person deciding on you actually sorts players, why your American résumé counts for less than you've been told, where you'll realistically start, and how to handle a lot of "no."

It isn't meant to talk you out of it. It's meant to make sure that if you go for it, you go in with your eyes open and a plan that improves your odds.

THE POINT

Before you spend money on camps, film, or agents, figure out where you actually stand. You can't fix an honest self-assessment, but you can work with it. A flattering self-assessment will cost you a year.

How Scouts Actually Filter You

This is the unfortunate reality, so let's start with it.

Scouts and GMs filter you before they ever watch you play.

You probably think film comes first: send the highlight tape, they watch it, they're impressed, you get a call. It almost never works that way.

A club GM in a mid-level European league might get hundreds of names for a single import spot. A scout working the overseas market sees more players than they could ever watch. Nobody has time to watch everyone's film. So before your tape gets played, you go through a set of filters, roughly in this order.

Filter 1: The advocate

The first question is who is bringing you to me?

Every player who reaches a decision-maker got there somehow:

- An agent they work with
- A current player they know
- Your college coach
- Another GM or club executive
- A social media post that got passed around
- A cold email or DM
- Pure chance

These are not equal. What matters is the advocate's relationship with the decision-maker, how much the decision-maker trusts them, and their reputation for knowing what they're talking about.

When a trusted agent with a good track record says "you need to see this guy," that player goes to the top of the pile. A cold email from a player nobody has heard of goes to the bottom, if anyone reads it at all.

That isn't fair, and it isn't meant to be. It's how busy people manage risk. A recommendation from someone they trust is a shortcut, because that person has already done some of the filtering.

UNFORTUNATE REALITY

Two players with identical talent can have completely different careers depending on who is speaking up for them. Your advocate matters about as much as your jump shot in getting a first look.

Filter 2: The numbers

Next is what's on paper, meaning things that can be compared objectively:

- Measurables: height, weight, wingspan, vertical
- Stats: points, rebounds, assists, turnovers, steals
- Level: where you put up those numbers
- Context: how your numbers at that level compare to players at other levels

Box-score stats and a listed height are far from the perfect way to judge a basketball player. Everybody in the business knows that. But the point is metrics. Numbers let someone compare you to a hundred other players in two minutes without watching a minute of film.

So if your numbers are hard to find, inconsistent, or missing, you've made the decision-maker's job harder. And when someone's job gets harder, they usually move on to the next name.

Filter 3: The comparables

This is the filter most players have never heard of, and it might be the most important.

The question is: who do I know that succeeded at my level with a similar profile? In other words, a similar advocate, similar numbers, or both.

A good evaluator keeps a mental library of players. When they look at you, they're asking:

- Physically, do your height, weight, and wingspan match guys who made it in this league?
- Statistically, do your points, rebounds, assists, turnovers, and steals look like theirs?
- On the advanced side, what are your assist rate, usage, and efficiency like?
- And at what level did you do all of it?

Then comes the key question: does your profile look like the players who succeeded at this level, or like the ones who didn't?

If you look like guys who've thrived in that league, you're an easy yes to look at further. If you look like guys who got cut in November, you're a risk, even if you're better than they were.

INSIDER TIP

You can do this exercise yourself. Find Americans who signed their first contract in the leagues you're targeting. Look up their college stats, size, and school level, and ask honestly whether you look like them. If you do, that's your evidence. If you don't, you've learned where to aim instead.

Then, and only then: film

If you make it through the advocate, the numbers, and the comparables, now someone watches your film.

Film still matters a lot. It's where you confirm what's on paper, show how you play, and make someone want to see more. But film is the last filter, not the first.

So a beautiful highlight reel with no advocate, thin numbers, and no clear comparables often never gets watched.

TAKEAWAY

Work on all four, in order. Find an advocate, make your numbers easy to find and verify, know your comparables, and then polish your film.

Why Your US Résumé Matters Less Than You Think

Players misjudge their level in two directions, and both hurt.

Some get too excited. "I played D1, so I should be in a good league." Not necessarily.

Some get too discouraged. "I only played JUCO, or no college at all, so nobody overseas will want me." Also not necessarily.

Here's why. International coaches and GMs value one thing above almost everything else:

Proven production at their level. Or the level just below it, or on another team in their league.

Most of them don't understand the American system very well. They don't know the difference between a strong mid-major and a struggling power-conference program. They can't tell you how D2 compares to NAIA. American college basketball is a huge, confusing ladder, and from overseas it mostly looks like a blur.

That has some surprising effects:

- Ten points a game at a D1 school might mean more to them than big numbers at D2 or D3, because "D1" is a label they recognize.
- But thirty a game at a bad D1 program doesn't automatically put you ahead of a D2 All-American or a standout D3 player. Inflated numbers on a losing team don't impress people for long.
- Your conference, your awards, and your school's tradition often mean very little to a club GM in Greece or Japan.

The international game is a different game

Even more important: what you did in America doesn't transfer directly. The international game is different.

- The court is slightly smaller and the three-point line works differently, so spacing is tighter.
- It's more physical. Contact a US referee would call often goes unwhistled.
- The game is more structured. Coaches expect players to run sets, defend within a system, and make the right read rather than just create.
- Imports are expected to produce right away. You're not there to develop. You're there to help win this weekend.

So the question clubs really care about isn't "what did you do in college?" It's "what have you done outside America?"

The good news hidden in all this

This cuts both ways, and the other direction is great news for a lot of players.

If you don't have a prestigious résumé, you can start in a lower league overseas without being held back by your US background. And one good season overseas can quickly take you further than your entire US résumé ever could.

Once you've produced in a professional league abroad, you have something every GM understands: proven production in their world. Your American résumé starts to matter less, and your pro résumé starts to matter more.

UNFORTUNATE REALITY

Lower your expectations for contract #1 Getting the first contract is the hardest part of the whole journey. You'll probably start lower than you think you deserve. That's normal, and it isn't a judgment of your ceiling. Think of it as the entry fee.

Where You'll Realistically Start

Here's a sentence that surprises a lot of players:

Most players, from a D1 bench player down to a JUCO player or a player with no college at all, start at roughly the same level overseas.

Yes, really. That D1 bench player and the JUCO standout are often competing for the same entry-level import spots in the same entry-level leagues.

Those starter leagues tend to be lower divisions in Europe and smaller national leagues around the world. Pay can be modest, sometimes with housing, a car, or meals instead of a big salary. Conditions vary a lot. But they're real professional jobs, and they get you film, stats, and production against professionals. That's the currency you need to move up.

The exceptions

Some players skip the bottom rungs and go straight into a higher tier, the leagues we rank as Tier 3, Tier 2, or even Tier 1 on this site.

These exceptions are extremely rare. They generally fall into two groups:

1. You've been in an NBA camp. That means a training camp invite, a summer league roster, or similar. It's a signal that people at the highest level evaluated you and took you seriously.
2. You produced at a really high D1 level and chose to go overseas. We mean a major contributor on a strong high-major team, the kind of player who had other options.

If neither describes you, plan as if you're starting at the entry level. If one does, you still need a strong advocate to turn it into a contract.

HONEST CHECK

Don't decide you're an exception because a coach, parent, or friend says you're "better than half the guys over there." You might be. But the people signing you rely on the filters above, not on what your circle thinks.

Age and Maturity

Players in their late twenties and thirties often ask: Am I too old?

Age doesn't matter as much as you think. There are real examples of players who got their first NBA game in their thirties after years of grinding through the minor leagues and overseas. Careers in this world don't follow one schedule.

If anything, being young can work against you overseas.

That surprises American players, because in the US youth is upside. But many European teams are skeptical of very young imports, and the reasons make sense:

- It's a "man's game." Your teammates and opponents may be veterans in their late twenties and thirties who have played pro ball for a decade.
- The court is smaller and the game is more physical. There's less space to play your way through mistakes.
- It takes maturity. You'll be living in a foreign country, often alone, with a new language, new food, a new coach, and pressure to produce immediately. Clubs worry about homesickness, discipline, and how a young player handles a bad stretch.

The American game is more open and less physical, which favors young athleticism. The European game rewards strength, poise, decision-making, and knowing how to play. Those usually come with age.

So if you're 26, 28, or 30 and wondering whether the window has closed, it may not have. Clubs care whether you can produce now and handle the life. Your birth year matters less.

INSIDER TIP

Make maturity visible If you're older, lean into it. Show up in shape, be reliable and professional in every message, and present yourself as someone who will help a team win without needing to be managed. That's exactly what clubs are worried about with younger imports.

No College? Start With an Advocate

If you didn't play college basketball, or your college career was very short, the filters above work against you from the start. You may not have stats. You have no comparables because there's nothing to compare. That leaves one thing you can actually work on:

Your first job is to find an advocate.

Without numbers or comparables, you need someone with credibility to say, "Trust me, watch this player." That could be:

- Someone you've played with who is now in the pro world
- Someone who knows someone: a trainer, a former pro, a coach with overseas contacts
- An agent who agrees to come watch you play or bring you to a tryout
- A US coach at any level who can pick up the phone and call someone overseas

Getting attention is hard

Getting noticed without a track record takes real effort. Your options include:

- Film from wherever you can get it: men's leagues, pro-am runs, open tournaments, obscure places. Imperfect film beats no film.
- Showing up in person: open gyms, runs where pros train in the offseason, anywhere decision-makers or their contacts might be.
- Camps and showcases: exposure camps, combines, and pro tryouts built for players trying to get seen. (Choose carefully. Later chapters and the site's camp profiles and "Is this camp legit?" checker cover how to separate legitimate camps from cash grabs.)
- Anywhere people who matter can see you play.

The 100-team email blast

Many players try sending their film to a hundred teams at once. It's a legitimate approach, and some players have gotten jobs that way.

But know the odds. You might get two or three replies, and those replies might not lead anywhere. It's slow, impersonal, and inefficient.

A better use of your time: spend that energy finding an advocate. One agent, one well-connected person, or one coach who will make a call can help you skip a line that a hundred cold emails never will.

TAKEAWAY

Action step Write down every person you know who has any connection to pro basketball, even a distant one: former teammates, coaches, trainers, people from your gym, friends of friends. That list is where your search for an advocate starts. Most players have more connections than they think.

The Hard Truth About "No"

If you remember one thing from this chapter, make it this:

Get used to the word "no."

You're going to hear it a lot from agents, clubs, camps, and contacts. Plenty of times you won't even get a no. You'll just get silence.

Don't get discouraged, and don't take it personally. It isn't personal. The people saying no don't know you. They aren't thinking about your feelings, your story, or how hard you've worked. They're running a business.

And everybody wants into this business. For every import spot there are many players who would take it tomorrow. If a club or agent thinks you can help them, they'll come after you. If they don't, they'll move on, and that's the whole decision.

So be honest with yourself:

Are you willing to take tens of no's? Hundreds? Close to a thousand?

For a lot of players who eventually make it, that's what it took.

But here's the other side

Being honest also means saying the part that's hard to hear.

There's real risk in this path. Chasing a pro career takes time, money, and effort you may never get back. Those are years you could spend building a career, finishing a degree, or saving money.

Don't let no discourage you. But also be realistic that there may never be a yes.

That's a dangerous line to walk when it's your life. Being persistent is a strength, but refusing to plan for any other outcome is a risk. The best approach is to do both:

- Go after it completely, with a real plan and real effort.

- Set yourself a timeframe and a budget for how long and how much you'll invest before you reassess.
- Keep a parallel path alive: work, school, certifications, anything that keeps your life moving if basketball doesn't come through.

That isn't quitting before you start. It's making sure that however this goes, you come out of it okay.

HONEST CHECK

The honest bottom line Expect a lot of no's. Don't take them personally. Keep going. And decide ahead of time what "enough" looks like, so the decision is yours and not something you drift into.

Self-Assessment Checklist

Grab a pen. Be brutally honest, because nobody else will see this.

Your advocate

- ☐ I have at least one person with credibility in the pro world willing to vouch for me.
- ☐ I know how that person is connected to agents, clubs, or scouts.
- ☐ If not, I've written a list of every contact who could lead me to one.

Your numbers

- ☐ My height, weight, and (ideally) wingspan and vertical are accurately measured and written down. No rounding up.
- ☐ My stats are easy to find and verify online (a stats page, a league site, a box score link).
- ☐ I understand how my level of play is likely to be viewed overseas.

Your comparables

- ☐ I've found at least 3–5 players with a similar size, statistical profile, and school level who signed overseas.
- ☐ I know which leagues those players started in.
- ☐ I've honestly asked whether my profile looks more like the players who made it or the ones who didn't.

Your film

- ☐ I have a highlight video of 2–4 minutes with my best plays first.
- ☐ I have at least one or two full, unedited games available.
- ☐ My film clearly shows which player I am (jersey number and color noted up front).

Your expectations

- ☐ I'm prepared to start in an entry-level league, wherever that may be.
- ☐ I understand my US résumé gets me a look, not a job.
- ☐ I'm ready to live abroad: new language, physical play, pressure to produce right away.

Your reality check

- ☐ I have a valid passport, or I've applied for one.
- ☐ I've checked whether I qualify for a second citizenship through a parent or grandparent. (In many leagues this can change your status from import to local.)
- ☐ I've set a timeframe and a budget for this pursuit.
- ☐ I have a backup plan I'm actively keeping alive.
- ☐ I'm ready to hear "no" many times without letting it break me.

HOW DID YOU DO?

How did you do? Mostly checked: You're ready to start targeting leagues and advocates seriously. Gaps in advocate, numbers, or comparables: Fix those first. They're the filters that decide whether your film gets watched. Gaps in expectations or reality check: Have an honest conversation with yourself (and maybe someone you trust) before you spend money.

Next Steps

You now know how you'll be judged. Here's how to start using that, with tools on this site built for exactly this stage:

1. See where first contracts usually happen. Go to the Starter leagues view to find leagues that commonly sign first-year imports. Start your comparables research there.
2. Learn the landscape. Use the League explorer to compare leagues by tier, import rules, typical pay, and signing windows. Know which leagues allow how many Americans before you aim at them.
3. Find places to be seen. Check the Calendar for upcoming tryouts, exposure camps, and showcases. Pick events you can realistically get to and afford, and read the reviews first.
4. Start building your advocate list. Browse the Agent directory to see who represents players at the levels you're targeting. Look for agents whose clients resemble your profile. Those are the people most likely to see you as an opportunity.

NEXT CHAPTER

Coming up in Chapter 2 Picking the right leagues. Now that you know where you stand, we'll show you how to choose where to aim: how tiers work, which leagues fit your game, and how to build a realistic target list.

The Passport Hoops Playbook is an independent guide. It isn't legal, immigration, or financial advice. Always verify contract terms, visa requirements, and agent credentials yourself before you commit.

FREE SAMPLE • CHAPTER 2

Picking the Right Leagues

There are hundreds of professional leagues outside the United States. Most players pick from about five: the ones they've heard of, the ones their friends played in, or the ones that pay the most.

That's backwards.

Picking where to aim is a strategy decision, not a wish list. Aim too high and you spend a summer collecting silence. Aim at a league that doesn't fit your game and you could land a contract, struggle, and get released before Christmas. Aim at a league with almost no import spots and you're competing with half the world for one seat.

This chapter shows you how to aim. It covers how tiers work, why year one is about credibility rather than money, how to match a league's style to your game, how import rules and signing windows actually affect your chances, and how to turn all of it into a target list of 10–15 leagues.

THE POINT

You don't need the best league. You need the right first league: one you can realistically get into, where your game fits, and where a good season moves you up.

Not covered here: leagues to avoid Some leagues and clubs have a reputation for late pay, broken promises, or worse. That's an important topic, and a future edition will cover it. For now, ask your advocates, report scams or bad experiences when you see them, and always verify a club before you sign.

How Tiers Work

On this site, every league is placed on a level and given a tier. Think of it as a ladder:

Tier	Name	What it generally means
1	Elite	The top of the international game. Many players here have NBA experience.
2	High-major	Top domestic leagues in strong basketball countries. Very hard for a first-year import.
3	Strong	Solid top divisions and the best second divisions. Good pay, real competition.

Tier	Name	What it generally means
4	Solid	Professional leagues with a clear role for imports. Many second-contract players.
5	Entry	Lower divisions and smaller national leagues. Where most first contracts happen.

Each league also has a level score, a single number for roughly how strong it is. It lets you compare leagues across countries, so a second division in one country can rank above the top division in another.

The tiers are estimates built from public information such as reported pay, import rules, and where players move next. They aren't official rankings. But they give you a common language, and that's what you need to plan.

Where you should aim

Here's the honest version, which follows from Chapter 1:

Expect to start in Tier 3 or below. Most first-year imports start in Tier 4 or Tier 5.

If you have a very strong college or US résumé (a major role at a high level, an NBA camp, real professional interest already), you can consider Tier 2. Know going in that Tier 2 is really difficult for a first contract. Treat it as a reach, not a plan.

UNFORTUNATE REALITY

Tier 1 and Tier 2 clubs mostly sign players who have already proven themselves overseas. They want someone who has done it at a level just below theirs, not someone who might do it. That's why where you start matters so much.

Year One: Credibility, Not Salary

This is the most important idea in the chapter:

Do not target salary in year one. Not even a little.

Your first year overseas is by far the most important year of your career. It isn't about money. It's about reputation and credibility.

Think about what a first contract gets you:

- A pro résumé. The moment you play a professional season abroad, you're no longer "a college guy." You're a pro with international stats.

- Proven production at a level. Chapter 1 explained that this is what clubs value most. Year one is where you start earning it.
- Film against professionals. It's far more convincing than college or pro-am film.
- Comparables in your favor. Next summer, GMs can compare you to players in your league, which is a comparison they understand.
- An advocate network. Coaches, teammates, and agents who saw you up close become people who can vouch for you.

So when you pick a first league, choose the one that gives you the most credibility and upward mobility. That means a league whose standouts regularly move up, where imports play real minutes, and where a good season gets noticed.

What that means in practice

You may have to accept a deal that:

- Barely covers your living costs
- Lacks the amenities you'd hoped for, like a nice apartment, a car, or a flight home
- Is in a place you'd never have picked on a map

If the trade-off is the best chance to prove yourself and earn an international reputation, take it.

A first-year player who chases an extra few hundred dollars a month at a club where he'll sit, or in a league nobody watches, can lose the season that was supposed to launch his career.

INSIDER TIP

When comparing two offers, ask: "Where did last year's imports in this league go next?" If they moved up, that league is a launching pad. If they disappeared, it might be a dead end, however good the pay looks.

Takeaway Year one pays you in credibility. Year two and beyond are when that credibility turns into money.

Match the League to Your Game

Not every league plays the same basketball. A player who thrives in one style can struggle in another, and a bad fit makes it hard to produce.

So the question isn't only "where can I get in?" It's also "where will my game work?"

Europe: the half-court, physical game

Europe tends to suit players who are:

- Physically mature: strong enough to hold position and absorb contact

- Real shooters: reliable from three, not streaky
- Fundamentally sound: footwork, passing, help defense, running sets
- Skilled and smart: good decisions, few wasted possessions
- Comfortable in small spaces: able to operate against tough, physical, organized defense

Generally, European basketball is more structured and physical, with tight spacing and coaches who expect you to run the system. If that describes your game, Europe can be a natural launching pad.

Asia and South America: the open-court game

Asia and South America tend to suit players who:

- Thrive in the open court: up-and-down, transition, flow
- Like to run: a faster pace, more possessions
- Score and distribute: creators who can carry an offensive load
- Play with freedom: more of a pace-and-space or isolation style

Generally, many leagues in these regions play faster and more open, and they often lean on imports for big scoring numbers. If you're an athletic, high-volume creator who likes pace, these regions can be a better place to show it.

Other regions, in general terms

The patterns below are broad generalizations, and every league and coach is different. Treat them as starting points for research, not rules.

- Nordic countries (Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Iceland): Generally organized, professional leagues that often give imports real roles. Many players use them as early stepping stones into the wider European market.
- Balkans and Southeastern Europe: Generally known for strong fundamentals, demanding coaching, and a physical, tactical style. A good season there can carry credibility, but expect high standards.
- Latin America (beyond the biggest leagues): Generally includes many national and regional leagues, some with short seasons. Seasons can fall at different times of year, which can give you a chance to play when Europe is in its offseason.
- Australia's NBL1 and similar semi-pro leagues: Generally winter-season leagues (in the Southern Hemisphere) with a mix of local and import players. They're often used to stay active, get film, and build a résumé, but pay and conditions vary widely and are often modest.

HONEST CHECK

Be truthful about your style. If you've lived in transition and isolation, a structured, physical European second division might be a tough first fit. If you're a smart, strong, catch-and-shoot player, a run-and-gun league that expects 30 a night from its import might not show you at your best. Pick the league where your real game produces.

Import Rules and Signing Windows

This is where good planning really pays off. Import rules and signing windows decide how many doors are open and when.

Import rules: how many foreigners can a team carry?

Every league limits how many "foreign" or "import" players a team can roster and, sometimes, how many can be on the court at once. The details vary:

- Some leagues allow one import per team. Some allow two, three, or more.
- Some distinguish by passport, for example EU players vs. non-EU players. That's why the second-citizenship check in Chapter 1 matters.
- Some have on-court limits separate from roster limits.
- Some lower divisions allow few or no imports at all.

Here's the key strategy:

In year one, seek out leagues that allow more imports.

It's simple math. A league where every team can sign three Americans has many more open spots than a league that allows one. More spots means each club is less picky and more willing to take a chance on someone without a pro résumé.

Leaner, looser import rules mean a better chance of landing a job.

The exception is if you can genuinely get into a really exclusive league. If an advocate and your résumé can get you there, take the shot. For most first-year players, though, more import slots means more opportunity.

UNFORTUNATE REALITY

Watch for rule changes Leagues change import rules, sometimes from one season to the next. Always check the league's current rules and the date the site's information was last verified before you build your plan around them.

Signing windows: when are teams actually hiring?

Clubs don't sign players evenly through the year. There are rhythms.

The summer window (roughly June to September for most Northern Hemisphere leagues). This is when most rosters are built for the season. Clubs know their budgets, coaches want their imports in place for preseason, and agents are busiest. If you want a Northern Hemisphere contract, your preparation needs to be done before summer. Your film, your numbers, and your advocate need to be ready by spring, not August.

Mid-season replacements. Players get hurt, underperform, get homesick, or move to better offers. When that happens, clubs need someone now. Mid-season replacements are a real and underrated way to get a first contract:

- Clubs need someone who can get on a plane fast. Be available, keep your passport ready, and stay in shape.
- Clubs value players who are already playing somewhere, like a summer league or another short season, because they know you're in game shape.
- An advocate who knows you're ready can put your name forward the day a spot opens.

Different calendars, different chances. Not every league runs from fall to spring. Many leagues in Latin America, parts of Asia, and the Southern Hemisphere (including NBL1) run at other times of year. That means:

- You can play somewhere during the Northern Hemisphere offseason, staying active and building film.
- You can stack seasons: a summer league abroad followed by a winter league elsewhere.
- More calendars mean more chances each year to get signed.

INSIDER TIP

If you missed the summer window, don't sit at home. Look at leagues whose seasons start later, or that are known to sign replacements, and stay ready. The players who get mid-season calls are the ones in shape and easy to reach.

How to Use the Site's Tools, Step by Step

Here's how to turn this chapter into a list, using tools built for exactly this.

Step 1: Start with Starter leagues

Go to Starter leagues.

This view is pre-filtered to lower-level leagues that are more realistic for first contracts. Use the filters to narrow by:

- Level: start at "Low" and adjust
- Region: if you have a style preference (Europe vs. Asia vs. the Americas)
- Season start: "Starts Aug–Dec" for winter leagues, "Starts Jan–Jul" for summer leagues

Then try sorting by "Easiest to sign" to see which leagues look most open to newcomers, and by "Lowest level" to see the true entry points.

Step 2: Explore the full ladder

Open the League explorer to see every league on the ladder, from Entry up to Elite.

- Look at the import slots for each league, and favor leagues that allow more imports.
- Check reported pay, cost of living, and housing notes so you know what life looks like.
- Note the level score so you can see which leagues are one step up from your targets. That's where a good year one could take you.

Step 3: Read the rules

Go to the Rules index for each league you're seriously considering. Check:

- Import and foreign-player limits (roster and on-court)
- Passport categories (for example EU vs. non-EU)
- Registration and transfer windows
- Visa and documentation notes where available

Always look at the source and the "last checked" information, and verify with the league or club when it matters.

Step 4: Map out your calendar

Use the Calendar to line up:

- When your target leagues' seasons start, and so when they sign
- Tryouts, exposure camps, and showcases that line up with those windows
- Gaps where a different-season league could keep you active

Your goal is a plan where you're visible and ready in the weeks before your target leagues hire.

Worksheet: Build Your Target List (10–15 Leagues)

Use this to build a realistic list. Aim for a spread, not a single bet.

Part 1: Your profile (from Chapter 1)

- Realistic starting tier: ☐ Tier 5 (Entry) ☐ Tier 4 (Solid) ☐ Tier 3 (Strong) ☐ Tier 2 (reach)
- Your style: ☐ Physical, half-court, shooter ☐ Open-court, pace, creator ☐ Mix
- Passport status: ☐ US only ☐ Second citizenship (which: _____) ☐ Applying
- Available from (month): _____
- Advocate(s) who can help: _____

Part 2: Your list

Fill in 10–15 leagues. A healthy mix:

- 2–3 "reach" leagues: one tier above your realistic start
- 6–8 "target" leagues: your realistic tier, good fit for your style
- 3–4 "safety" leagues: easier to sign, more import spots, still a real pro résumé

#	League	Country	Tier	Import slots	Season start	Style fit (yes / ~ / no)	Reach / Target / Safety	Who can help me get in?
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13

#	League	Country	Tier	Import slots	Season start	Style fit (yes / ~ / no)	Reach / Target / Safety	Who can help me get in?
14
15

Part 3: Check your list

- ☐ Most of my list is at my realistic tier or below, not above it.
- ☐ I've favored leagues with more import slots.
- ☐ Each league fits my style of play, or I've noted why it might not.
- ☐ My list includes different season calendars, so I have more than one window.
- ☐ I've read the current rules for every league on the list.
- ☐ For each league, I know where its standout imports went next, so I know it's a launching pad.
- ☐ I've picked based on credibility and upward mobility, not salary.

HOW DID YOU DO?

Red flags in your own list All reaches? You're aiming too high. Add more targets and safeties. All one region? You're limiting your windows. Add another calendar. Mostly one-import leagues? You're competing for very few seats. Add leagues that allow more imports.

Next Steps

1. Fill in the worksheet using Starter leagues and the League explorer.
2. Check the rules for each of your 10–15 leagues in the Rules index.
3. Put your windows on a calendar using the site's Calendar, and mark the month you need to be ready by.
4. Match an advocate to each league, even if it's only "find someone who knows this league."
